of Aging and Older Characters for *Younger Readers, Middle Readers, & Older Readers from PreK to Grade 6

Background: Numerous studies have found that while American children have a positive view of old older adults in their own family, they have a negative world view of aging. Nobody had been able to explain this paradox. But Gene D. Cohen, M.D., Ph.D., Director of the Center on Aging, Health & Humanities at The George Washington University postulated that a major factor contributing to children's negative attitudes about aging is that the earliest literature in the form of fairy tales that the youngest of children are introduced to typically portray older people as wicked, weird, or weak—conveying very negative images of aging. Consider Cinderella's malevolent step mother, the evil old witch in Hansel and Gretel, the scheming Rumpelstiltskin, and the child abusing old lady who lived in a shoe as but a few examples. These are great classics, but what if families want to offer additional images—positive ones—of aging through literature to their children? To begin with, there have been very few reading lists available listing and describing books for the very young where older adults are portrayed positively. None have been easily accessible and widely recognized. To the extent that the youth of America have a better sense of the potential that can accompany aging, they can develop a life cycle perspective that improves their preparedness for both the problems and possibilities of later life as well as enhancing their attitudes toward positive intergenerational relationships. To address this gap, Dr. Cohen approached the Association for Library Service to Children (ALSC) of the American Library Association to explore collaboration in creating an authoritative, annotated, widely disseminated reading list for children, describing books portraying aging and older adults in a positive light. The effort was one of the initiatives coming out of the Center's newly established public education program on aging—known as the SEA Change Program, where SEA Change is an acronym for Societal Education about Aging for Change. The ALSC enthusiastically agreed to collaborate and used their infrastructure of librarians across the country to assemble a list of 91 books presenting aging realistically and positively for children from Pre-K through Grade 6. The Center on Aging, Health & Humanities had the list evaluated by more than 100 librarians and 100 consumers from around the country, and the evaluations came back overwhelmingly highly favorable. The reading list is now available for public use. After reviewing and/or using the list if you have further suggestion about other books that you think should be added to the list, please let us know. We will then, at a later time, publish a new list that includes reader recommendations. Also, any general comments you have about the list would be most appreciated. Meanwhile, we hope you find the book list that follows useful.
